Annual Reviews – Middle School annual reviews begin on April 29th. We had a very meaningful and productive day on April 2nd of individual teacher meetings to plan for those meetings. This is a part of an intensive, multi-step process to review each special education student individually and make recommendations for future programming. Teachers come to the meeting with the drafts of each student’s IEP developed (we view the information electronically) and we review their current progress and performance and give feedback on the section of the IEP that describes the student’s present levels of performance and programming needs and supports. Subsequent to this meeting, each teacher calls every family and discusses the programming suggestions for the coming year. They have a sheet that they fill out and return to Student Services. They notify the Special Ed Coordinator if there are any significant concerns as a result of that conversation. See attached form.

District-Wide PBIS Meeting – On May 9th we will have our year end District-Wide PBIS meeting and will be honoring a key person or persons from each building that has gone above and beyond to make a difference and aide in the continued implementation of the PBIS initiative. We continue to show impressive, positive changes in the number and type of referrals from each building as the teachers and staff become more proficient and consistent in the use of the PBIS systems.

AIS/RTI – We had a very productive meeting prior to the spring break with a thorough discussion of what currently exists in each building and what we need to support students. At our next meeting, we will be fleshing out the nuts and bolts of the plan to have ready for your approval in June.

Out of District Placements & Percentage of SWDs for Ulster County 2012-13 – At our monthly Pupil Personnel Directors meeting, we share our numbers of classified students and out of district placements to help in the preparation of the BOCES Space Plan and to look at how to best share services. We are still waiting for Rondout and New Paltz information, but we’ve attached the chart of the other districts for your information.

How Technology Is Helping Special-Needs Students Excel

Educators in California, Montana and Washington explain how technology makes it easier to engage students with physical and learning disabilities.

Heather B. Hayes

For Kevin O'Brien, a seventh-grader with physical disabilities who attends Charlotte Wood Middle School in Danville, Calif., there's a definite difference between good and great when it comes to assistive technology. For years, he used a desktop version of Tobii Technology’s eye-gaze device, which allowed him to type papers, participate in art classes, conduct online research, communicate with his teacher and do well academically. But it also tethered him to the classroom in which the wired device was located.

So when a wireless version of the product came out last year, Wendy Burkhardt, assistive technology coordinator for the San Ramon Valley Unified School District of which CWMS is a part, immediately got it for O’Brien, who attached it to his wheelchair. Now, she explains, "Kevin can be far more involved in group activities. He can converse with his peers, participate in class discussions, and do his homework, no matter where he is. This has increased his ability to be an independent member of the school and the community."

Successfully educating a special-needs child has always hinged on matching him or her with the best assistive learning device or application available. Fortunately, what's available has expanded and improved by quantum leaps over the past five years as traditional assistive technologies have converged with consumer technologies, giving the district's special education department a "much bigger toolbox to work with," Burkhardt says. "Everything has snowballed because of these innovative technologies."

For example, today's smartphones, tablets and other mobile devices come equipped with universal access functionality, making it possible for users to deploy built-in or easily downloaded assistive technologies. These include speech recognition, screen-reading tools, Braille displays and text-to-speech solutions for the visually impaired; and sound amplifiers, closed-captioning applications and video conferencing technologies that facilitate sign language and lip-reading for the hearing-impaired. Students with motor and mobility disabilities also can use speech recognition tools to turn speech into sharable text, e-books to eliminate page turning and portable eye-gaze devices that are powered by blinks.

Such technologies not only help students better understand concepts and keep up with their peers, they also allow the school to better and more easily integrate special-needs students into general education classes, says Tracy Gray, director of PowerUp What Works, the National Center for Technology Innovation and the Center for Implementing Technology in Education — three programs of the American Institutes for Research that work to improve the educational achievement of students with disabilities.

"The devices available to students with disabilities are no longer these big clunky things on a desk in a separate space away from the classroom," Gray explains. "Students now have access to assistive capabilities on technologies that are smaller, more mobile, more integrated and inexpensive. They're mainstream too, so that makes them cool. All students want to use them."

Opening Up the Classroom

This mainstreaming of assistive technologies is having a significant impact on students — and not just on those who have traditionally required accommodations, says Karen Heilbronner, director of secondary special education for SRVUSD. Among those who benefit most are children with learning disabilities.

"We're no longer limited to helping one particular student with a single specialized technology," Heilbronner says, noting that newer assistive technologies are facilitated by the district's recent investments in upgraded wired and wireless networks and a one-to-one tablet initiative. "These tools are easily extended to any student who needs them."

Those with communication, cognitive, reading, short-term memory or developmental issues are now using tools such as Nuance's Dragon NaturallySpeaking, which reads text back to them; Livescribe Smartpens, which capture everything spoken in class and written by the student; and web-based tools that help students organize their thoughts and assignments.

"We can now give students who have trouble reading every word on a page an e-book reader and text-to-speech capability, and they can sit in class with headphones on, listen to the words as they're read to them and then weigh in on core literature discussions," Burkhardt explains. "In the past, these would have been the students in the back who wouldn't participate, who would have been considered either the shy introvert or the behavioral problem because they weren't able to effectively engage. These tools are really making a difference."

In fact, many technologies designed for mainstream use can be successfully repurposed to teach students with disabilities. The Montana School for the Deaf & Blind in Great Falls, Mont., for example, relies on interactive whiteboards — a mainstay for most traditional K–12 schools — to better engage its students.

Diane Moog, a teacher in the school's department for the deaf and hard of hearing, says that the technology helps motivate and engage students in the subject they're studying. "For the kids who have difficulty with the whole language concept, what helps solidify vocabulary and language structure is being able to relate to what you're teaching them," she explains. With an interactive whiteboard, "they can touch the screen, see and manipulate visuals illustrating the vocabulary words, move words around to make sentences — it gives them something to which they can attach language."

As her students work at the whiteboard, Moog also requires them to explain what they're doing and why, which not only helps them further develop skills, but also helps her determine their level of understanding. "I can meet their needs a lot better if I know how they're processing what I'm trying to teach them," she says, noting that the whiteboards are currently being evaluated by the school's department for the visually impaired. "If a student is making errors in a math problem, I can see where the process is breaking down for them and then show them what it's supposed to look like and why.

From a Distance

The Washington State School for the Blind also has turned to mainstream technologies to enhance teaching and learning. With help from Microsoft Lync, a unified communications platform that provides video, voice, instant messaging and telepresence, the Vancouver, Wash., school is offering distance instruction in algebra, geometry, pre-calculus and other topics to its 79 students and to special-needs students at other schools.

According to Digital Research and Curriculum Development Coordinator Sherry Hahn, WSSB's technology team initially went in search of a distance learning system as a way to acquire the services of math teacher Robin Lowell, who lives 170 miles away and, for family reasons, couldn't teach in person on campus.

"Math is an extremely difficult subject to teach to a blind or visually impaired student because it is, of course, so visual," Hahn explains. "It takes a unique, experienced teacher to help these students really understand and get the concepts and skills they need to be able to do it independently. Robin is a teacher who can do that, and we wanted to be able to make her available for our students."
After testing and rejecting different variations on basic two-way video and web conferencing, Hahn and her IT team stumbled across Microsoft Lync. Combined with Braille display software, a screen-reading program and a specialized language known as MathSpeak, Lync enables Lowell to see and communicate with her students and to share the different screens on her desktop. "It's like being at a control center," Lowell says. "I can watch all my kids and see their work at the same time."

One of the most incredible features of Lync, Lowell adds, is the ability to instant-message with her students. "It's really a new avenue for kids to be able to reach their teacher in the middle of the lesson without interrupting," she says. "Then, I can seamlessly put questions into my lecture or our discussion without changing topics or disrupting the flow of the class."

Since implementing the solution in 2010, Lowell has been shocked by the academic improvement she's seen. "This technology has been an amazing eye-opener," she says.
Hiring Heats Up in K-12 Teaching Specialties

Changing curriculum standards and demographics are driving demand for teachers in various specialties.

By RETT FISHER

April 2, 2013

Job openings for K-12 teachers who specialize in special education and STEM fields are increasing.

Big changes in education, driven by changing curriculum standards, demographics and diagnoses of kids with special needs, are creating opportunities for graduates with the right skill sets. Josh Fernandez is one new teacher who has capitalized on these changes. In 2008, Fernandez, a communications grad of East Carolina University, began working as a paraprofessional at Maryland’s Gaithersburg High School, helping a paraplegic student with his day-to-day activities.

Realizing that he’d found his calling, Fernandez pursued a master’s in special education part time at the Johns Hopkins University School of Education. After graduating in June 2012, he was immediately hired by his high school to teach special ed.

Around the country, many districts are adding staff in response to the burgeoning number of students diagnosed with special needs; the Bureau of Labor Statistics projects hires will grow 17 percent between 2010 and 2020.

The increasing prevalence of autism (affecting 1 in 88 children in 2008 versus 1 in 150 in 2000, reports the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention) and attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (9 percent of 5- to 17-year-olds in the CDC’s latest survey, up two points since the late ’90s) have contributed to the sudden surge.

Special ed is such a "critical need area at all levels," says Jeffrey Martinez, director of the department of recruitment and staffing for Montgomery County Public Schools, where Fernandez teaches, that the district offers to pick up a substantial portion of the costs for tuition, books and fees for employees pursuing a master’s at Johns Hopkins who agree to work in the school system for two years.

Demographic shifts are fueling hiring in another hot area: English as a second language. According to the Pew Research Center, a record 23.9 percent of children in pre-K through 12th grade were Hispanic in 2011.

This trend will only continue: By 2050, Hispanics will represent 38 percent of all school-age children. Jeff Edmundson, director of master’s degree programs in the department of education studies at the University of Oregon, says having a "bilingual endorsement," too, is better yet – meaning the teacher is also proficient in the language of the students being taught.

Meanwhile, the U.S. effort to stay globally competitive is creating an urgent push to get scientists and mathematicians into the classroom. In 2012, President Barack Obama challenged schools to "recruit 100,000 math and science teachers within the next 10 years" to help bring student performance up to snuff.

While the challenge of finding qualified teachers has "been going on forever," it is even greater now, says Steve Head, director of education portfolios and career services at the University of Wisconsin—Madison School of Education.

That's because new Common Core standards, adopted by almost all states and the District of Columbia, establish more rigorous uniform national learning goals for students in math, and a second movement is afoot to boost science standards. The College Board is also overhauling the way Advanced Placement science is taught.

Job candidates must now be "able to teach at the level that our students are going to be assessed at," explains Laurie deBettencourt, associate dean of educator preparation programs at Hopkins' School of Education. Several school districts deBettencourt works with have teamed up with universities to provide financial incentives to students with backgrounds in math and science who agree to get their master's and certification to teach K-12.

Anecdotally, the incentives seem to be working, she says. Many grads who before would have moved into other careers or higher education positions are opting instead to teach in grade school or high school.

The Central Administration of Ulster BOCES functions similarly to a Central Office in a local school district. In addition to the responsibilities performed by the District Superintendent's Office, the Administration provides many internal support services as part of its day-to-day operations. These include payroll, human resources, benefits coordination, fingerprinting, accounting, auditing, bidding, purchasing, budgeting, planning, and recruitment. Central Administration also provides local school district administrators with support and leadership on local, statewide, and national policy.

The budget includes the full-time equivalent of 2.10 certified administrators and 10.01 non-certified staff to support the execution of these functions for the benefit of all component school districts.

For 2013-2014, the proposed expenses for the Administrative Budget DECREASED by 3.63%, or $87,921. This is well below the allowable threshold for an austerity budget. However, due to significantly reduced miscellaneous revenues (interest earnings and revenues for administrative charges received from cross-contracts with non-component districts), the actual cost to Ulster BOCES districts will increase 4.8%. In better economic times, these miscellaneous revenues would lower district costs by providing an alternative revenue stream. To offset the lost revenue, the Capital Budget was also reduced by 3.61%, or $37,266. The net result is a $125,187 reduction to allowable expenses, resulting in a 2% increase in cost to our districts.

Kindergarten Registration
Parents continue to call and meet with the registrar to complete the registration packet.
Appointments for the annual screening day are being arranged and will be held on May 1st. At this point, one-hundred eight (108) packets have been signed out. Eighty-four (84) packets have been returned.

APPR
This year's APPR process is underway. All formal announced teacher observations/evaluations have been completed. Thirty-two (32) unannounced teacher observations/evaluations have been completed. It is expected that the remainder of the unannounced will be completed by early May. Composite score reports will be done once all observations/evaluations are done – it is expected that these will be done by mid-May.

NYS Testing Program
We are preparing for the upcoming state assessments. They will be held over six days in April. ELA will take place April 16, 17, 18. Math will take place April 24, 25, 26.

PTA
The PTA sponsored an ice cream social on April 3rd which was very successful. Although we do not have an exact count, there seems to have been more participation this year than in previous years. We came very close to running out of ice cream. A good time was had by all who attended.

Math/Science/Technology Symposium & Mad Science
Our annual MST Symposium was held Wednesday, March 20th. Students were actively engaged in showing their scientific knowledge to others. It was a great evening! Additionally, we held a Mad Science Assembly for all students during the day as a kick-off to the evening’s event!
PBIS
Our second McTeacher Night of the year will be held on Thursday, April 10th at the Highland McDonalds. A portion of the evening's proceeds will go to help fund the incentives used in our PBIS School Store.
